|---|---|---|
| | | The elderly population in the United States is growing faster than any other segment of the population, and has done so since 1900. It is estimated that this trend will continue at least through the year 2050. In 2004, there were 36.3 million people in the U.S. older than 65. One in eight persons is over 85 years, classified as 'old old.' By 2040, it is anticipated that one person in five will exceed 65 years of age, and the number of people over 85 will increase to four times their number today, representing the aging of the baby boomers. Aging is not a disease, but part of the normal life cycle, and many seniors retain good health and live independently for long past the traditional age of retirement. In time, however, most will develop one or more chronic conditions; for those over 75 years of age, the most common conditions are hypertension, heart disease, hearing loss, arthritis, and cataracts. By the year 2030, 150 million Americans are expected to have a chronic condition, and 42 million will be limited in their ability to work or live independently. Treating this population will require many medical and nonmedical services, integrated to provide a comprehensive continuum of care. See also Alzheimer's Disease. |
